Introduction

No one can doubt that following the recent upheaval of the US economy many communities across the nation are now faced with record unemployment. Hundreds of thousands of people have not only lost their jobs but the industry in which they worked has all but ceased to exist. Many of the jobs that are left either require college level education or are in some of the lowest paying industries. The hardest hit communities are those communities that were struggling before the economic crisis. Without substantial help from the US government and local organizations communities will continue to struggle. Now is the time for communities to focus on their existing assets to help their community members find gainful employment.

Assets vs. Needs

In times of distress we often want to focus on what we don't have instead of what we do have. While that may be a useful exercise, creating a map of deficiencies, it is more beneficial to create a map of existing assets. When the assets are realized the work of recovery can begin immediately. Following a map of deficiencies will only lead to a dead end.

While the concept of creating a community asset map is not a new phenomenon the use of it as a tool for rebuilding communities is only recently becoming more common place. The tried and true method of focusing on a community's problems, deficiencies and social service void areas in response to community distress is unfortunately still where we spend most of our time and energy.

Focusing on a community's needs alone has two very unfortunate consequences. One consequence is that residents begin to see themselves as a mirror image of those deficiencies. When told of all the resources they lack, community members internalize that information and begin to believe that they too are victims, incapable of righting their own ship, taking control of their lives and getting back on the road to self sufficiency. The other consequence is that focusing on needs only creates a map for survival only. It doesn't make provisions for growth in a community. Healthy communities need to continue to grow not just survive.

The old adage if you give a man a fish he will eat for a day but if you teach a man to fish he will feed his community for a life time is very true when discussing needs based vs. assets based community maps. In a perfect world outside resources would be readily available to descend upon a community and fix all the wrongs. In truth, with dwindling budgets, more often than not a community will need to rely upon its existing programs and services to build upon. Knowing all a communities assets is paramount to feeding a community for a lifetime.

Community Asset Map

According to Kretzmann and McKnight (1993) the assets of a community can be found in three areas, individuals, associations and institutions. Every individual should be considered, especially those that have been marginalized by economics, disability and age. People in these categories should be included in the discussion as all people have gifts no matter what their community status.

After looking at individuals their associations should be considered. These associations are how community members interact with other and share information about their community. Even in very low income areas people associate through religious activities, athletic events, cultural activities and recreationally like a pickup basketball game in a local park.

The third community asset area is the most visible in a community, the formal institution. Private businesses; public entities, like schools, fire departments, police forces, libraries, county owned community centers; nonprofit organizations that provide social services to community members, and faith based organizations comprise the formal institutions of a community. When creating an asset map including all the institutions is necessary for the success of the resource.

Strengthening Communities in Central Florida Program

In response to our nation's economic crisis, the US government decided to focus on strengthening the current economic recovery assets in communities around the nation instead of trying to recreate the wheel. The University of Central Florida's Center for Public and Nonprofit Management was the recipient of a grant from the United States Department of Health and Human Services (HHS) to provide capacity building training, technical and financial assistance to existing nonprofits in the economic distressed areas of West Orange, South Lake and South Sumter counties. As a caveat for training eligibility the nonprofits must provide economic recovery services to members of their respective communities. The training program will run for two 10 month cycles providing capacity building training to a total of 80 nonprofit organizations and provide additional technical and financial assistance to 20 nonprofits.

Grant monies from HHS will also be used to provide for the production of an economic recovery community asset map. The economic recovery community asset map, like all community asset maps, is a living document. It will change as the organizations change. New ones will be discovered and will need to be added.

Unfortunately some organizations may be unable to continue their work and will be eliminated.

Focus Area

The SCCFP Economic Recovery Community Asset Map focuses on all the formal institutions that provide economic recovery services to community members living in the geographic areas of West Orange, South Lake and South Sumter counties. While many of the institutions listed are physically located in Orange County, they provide services to the other geographic areas.

Research Methods

This asset map was created through extensive internet searches utilizing GuideStar, Donors Edge, and 211. It was also created through collaborations with Heart of Florida United Way, United Way of Lake and Sumter Counties, Community Foundation of Central Florida, Community Foundation of South Lake and personal interviews with key individuals in those communities.

Limitations

As Kretzmann and McKnight (1993) state a complete asset map must also include individuals and associations along with the formal institutions. A limitation of this asset map is that it only focuses on the formal institutions. The intent of this map is to be a helpful resource for the existing nonprofits working in the areas of economic recovery to give them the contact information for other institutions that are focusing on economic recovery. It is our hope that this asset map helps to foster organizational collaboration as well. While every attempt was made at accuracy this is a living document in that it will be constantly changed and updated. If you notice any discrepancies or deficiencies please contact the Center for Public and Nonprofit Management at cpnm@mail.ucf.edu.

Thank you.
