GLOBAL ADVOCACY

Advanced-level study of international systems, policies and perspectives helps prepare students to advocate for improved health and welfare in communities worldwide. Learning with students from multiple disciplines fosters interdisciplinary problem-solving of global issues.

GLOBAL HEALTH AND PUBLIC AFFAIRS AT UCF

UCF's new Graduate Certificate in Global Health and Public Affairs consists of 12 credit hours of study. Students take two required courses, including a research seminar. They also take two elective courses, one of which may be a study abroad course offered by the College of Health and Public Affairs, College of Nursing or College of Medicine. Students select a concentration in either Global Health or Global Public Affairs.

Global Health Concentration

Students select two courses from a group of eight elective courses on topics such as diverse populations, international health systems, lifestyle medicine and violence against women.

Global Public Affairs Concentration

Students select two courses from a group of five elective courses covering subject areas such as international law, justice, human rights, and public policy and governance.
